

Where do

working class

ground up and incurring the cost of building brand new buildings. While the remodeling saves money, it certainly doesn't lack in the home-like feel of warmth and family when you walk into any of The Arbors five communities. The Arbors is very much a warm community, much like the seniors' own home they are moving from. It is not a cold facility, and not a poshy hotel. It's just right, as Goldilocks would say.

As with many issues facing Americans today, the working class seems to get lost in the shuffle and forgotten about. The same may be said for assisted living communities. Many senior living operators and investors have been focusing on high income families, giving them many choices. For lower-income families, state and local programs provide housing and care services through programs such as Medicaid.

But what about the retired police officer, nurse or teacher? They may have a pension, social security, and possibly a sale of a house, but certainly not enough to cover some of those high cost facilities. And as our parents age, the added costs of their daily living care will increase as well as the burden on the family. Many of the middle class families try to take on the burden of their aging parents themselves, feeling like they "owe" it to their parents to take care of them. While the intensions are great, it may not be the best option for the senior. While the adult child is at work all day, their parent may be lonely at home by themselves, or with an aide. Lacking the socialization they once had, can lead to depression; or lack of exercise may lead to injuries or falls. So Assisted Living may be the right option for the best interest of the senior.

The Arbors Assisted Living has created a philosophy surrounding the forgotten middle-class senior, giving them an opportunity to live with dignity and respect while receiving the help from professionals looking after them, at a reasonable price. The Arbors model involves retrofitting buildings to suit their needs instead of building from the

When it comes to Assisted Living, the choice is simple. The Arbors is Long Island's premier all-inclusive community.
